

RAINFOREST PARTNERSHIP: ANNUAL REPORT 2010

Our mission is to partner with people who live in and around tropical rainforests to develop environmentally sustainable economies to protect and regenerate their forests. Our vision is that, together with our partners, we will become a global leader in the development of sustainable economies to preserve tropical rainforests around the world.

How RP Works: Rainforest Partnership creates mechanisms for conservation and sustainable use of rainforests in Latin America. The primary threat to rainforests is economic. The communities living in and around rainforests have limited options to earn a livelihood. Historically, many have needed to clear-cut the forests and use the land for pasture, cash crops or logging. Creating sustainable economic alternatives to deforestation gives the local communities a stake in preserving their forests. Rainforest Partnership works with each local community to tailor the preservation strategy to the needs, desires, knowledge, skills and culture of the community.

PROJECTS IN 2010

Chipaota, Peru: After a summer of hard work, the community of Chipaota completed its new broom production facility with help from international student volunteers. The community was previously selling the piassaba palm fiber in the local market, but with the new facility they are now able to sell and market a value-added product. In September, ECOMUSA, the association of piassaba harvesters, was recognized by the city of Tarapoto and can now legally market their finished products. Once the members of the community business were trained on how to use the equipment, broom production began in October. Since then, the broom factory has been running smoothly and filling orders. ECOMUSA is now looking to develop a relationship with the regional government and sell brooms that would be used by clean-up workers in the area.

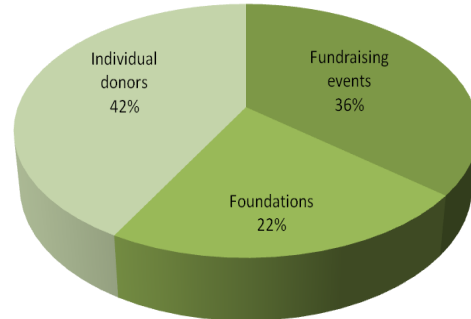

Sani Isla, Ecuador: Rainforest Partnership began working in the Sani Isla community in February of 2010 in partnership with the Ecuadorian nonprofit Conservación y Desarrollo. The goal was to develop an alternative income stream promoting the recovery of native species in the forest. After months of deliberation, the indigenous Ecuadorian community of Sani Isla proposed an income-producing project that featured a traditional woman's role - Kichwa arts and crafts. In July 2010, the community of Sani Isla finished construction on their artists' studio, five months ahead of schedule. The community will use the "studio" for arts and crafts production, providing women with a place to work together, exchange ideas and experiences, and sell their products to visitors from the nearby ecolodge.

Colibri Cloudforest, Peru: The Colibri Cloudforest area used to host widespread deforestation, with many communities cutting down the forest in order to plant crops or create pastureland. In 2009, the San Antonio and Calabaza communities took action to conserve the cloudforest by prohibiting butterfly and orchid collection, bird and bear hunting, and forest burning and cutting. By doing so, the communities created the opportunity for an "ecotravel" destination. Rainforest Partnership worked with the communities in 2010 to develop infrastructure to support ecotourism, including initiating a campaign to clean up the community, repainting many buildings, creating trails, adopting hygienic cooking practices, and starting waste management and collection programs. In 2011, RP will help create a basic ecolodge in Calabaza and a hostel in San Antonio that will be a great spot for backpackers and birders.
